Outlook rules A: A PList file is a Windows.PLIST file with the associated image files. Windows does not know what a.plist file is, so it will not execute it. .plist is a common file extension on Mac OS X, but almost no other operating systems have had a use for.plist files. This is a Windows problem and not Ubuntu. If you want to execute a.PLIST file, you need to convert it to some executable format the operating system recognises. Windows has the.exe file format, Mac OS has.app file format, Linux has.deb, FreeBSD has.tgz, AArch64 has.a and Zulu has.gz. The proper name is a command line argument to the tool. An "executable PLIST" file is likely to be an Apple.app file. The.app format is really a zip file containing multiple executables. The.app file extension is misleading because the.app contains multiple executables. The file header, followed by a bunch of data, contains a list of executable files and their sizes. I don't know if Ubuntu or Windows have a.exe-equivalent file format. You could try converting an Ubuntu.PLIST file to an Ubuntu executable (using one of the GUI converters for the.PLIST file format) and trying to run that. The best way to resolve this is to either use Python or Ruby to get the contents of the.PLIST file and read it into a list of string. Each string is one of the executable names. Example: import subprocess as sp import csv with open('/home/user/Desktop/pops.plist', 'r') as fh: print('Contents of'+ fh.name) print(fh.read()) print('=====') with open('/home/user/Desktop/pops.txt', 'w') as fh: spamReader = csv.reader(fh, delimiter='\t') for row in spamReader: pass = True for name in row: cmd = "/usr/bin/open"
