In the following code, is 'res' using global variables? res = 0 def my_func(): print('start') for i in range(10): res = res + 1 print('end') print('exit') print('First') my_func() print('First inside for loop') A: Yes, it's using global variables. However, that's not the real issue. Is it good practice to pass global variables into functions? Is using global variables bad? A function is just a nice wrapper to have objects passed as parameters. In Python that includes global objects. Your example is making only local copies of the global variable res. The only reason you are using global res is to pass it to the range function. This is bad programming. You only want res to be local to the function. This is best demonstrated by the following example: res = 0 def my_func(): res = 1 def my_func(): res = 2 The code above makes use of global res so in fact you are using global variables. You could create local variables: def my_func(): res = 0 res = 1 def my_func(): res = 0 res = 1 However, the first example creates a local copy of global res. In the second, it makes use of the global res. However, the global res is copied as well. However, with your example, the global res is only passed to the range function. I think it's safe to say that this game is going to be a hit b7e8fd5c8
